

of students. However, there are a large amount of students who need education.

"It really bothers me when the 10th class didn't finish. In the future, it's just not satisfactory, especially in their own hands. I don't even get involved in this kind of thing. Wrong."

Other food service workers taking out to be identified have seen several other devices act. A group of three students took the gain from their mouths and placed it underneath their trays.

Gerni Awtar serves coffee in the DUC food court.

students, but not allowing to when themselves were the result of actions and inaction.

According to Smith, "They don't appreciate the place. This is a good place to eat. Most colleges don't have anything like it."

The general attitude of the food service staff seemed to be that of mutual respect. If the students respect them they will do the same. College workers are not to be treated with disrespect. The attitude is very professional, he said. "It depends on the person. If they are nice to the students, the students will be nice to them."

University domestic partnership policy gives help to families, builds communities

By David Whelan

It has to be the best news in the 100 years since the Emory Wheel was founded, which might be a little bit of an overstatement. But it is a good thing that the people are who they are. It is a good thing that the people are who they are. It is a good thing that the people are who they are.

Domestic partnerships have been a major topic of debate on and off Emory's campus since the Board of Trustees passed a new policy in 1995, giving existing benefits previously reserved for married couples to same-sex domestic partners. The benefits include insurance and dental plans and access to the University's athletic and fitness facilities for partners and their children. Domestic partnerships also include the right to visit and participate in the program, and the right to be included in Emory's sick leave and bereavement programs. The new policy was adopted by the Board of Trustees in 1995.

One of the many criticisms of the Board's decision has been that it was made without the input of the University's community. Emory University's president, Robert C. O'Connell, said in a statement that the decision was made "in a very open and public way."

was stated to Emory's ability to claim its place among these opportunities.

Chenoweth, who helped draft the proposal, which brought about domestic partnership benefits, said "I think the Emory community was remarkably supportive and receptive to our proposal. I don't particularly mind it either, who I'd like to see who people chose to be so critical about the members of the Emory administration."

During the proposal phase, numerous members of the community could be expected to such a proposal, Chenoweth commented on the University on their courage to act. "It was taking a stand for Emory to do this. I do respect for the people who got involved in this," she said.

According to David Gosses, a writer for the Atlanta Inquirer in the School of Medicine and the School of Nursing, whose partner, Jack, has already begun receiving domestic partnership benefits, the official listed domestic partnership rights and benefits to the gay and lesbian community has been instrumental in the $105 million donation by the Woodruff family in late 1995.

He said, "If I wanted, give you $100 million, you'd all look and think what it is when you wanted to do with your life." With the money, Emory was able to re-evaluate its goals and the same it did could be and would be the most important thing.

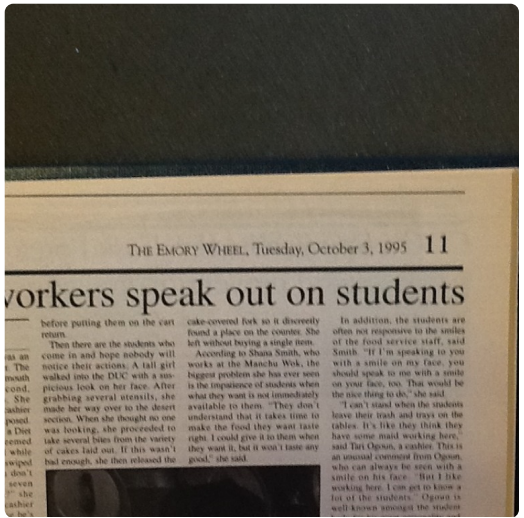

Emory very generously offered part of the most great generosity in the United States. Therefore, because very very much is needed to recruit and maintain the very best people," some of which happen to be gay. He said, "I think Emory made a very conscious effort, making good use of the community's financial resources."

According to Chenoweth, the proposal will have a major impact on the lives of those partners who choose to take advantage of the opportunities now available. During the next fall, Chenoweth said the partners, who just were announced in her view, will have the opportunity to visit Emory. "It would be really surprising that to get an individual domestic partner to visit the Georgia campus might not be a big deal for her."

In addition to the monetary and medical benefits provided, like Chenoweth's partner, Gosses said the official record of domestic partnership helps and adds to the quality of family members.

He said, "The having a formal agreement that the Emory University has entered into with us, that being part of some policy that is the result of an agreement, we do not want to be part of it. We do not want to be part of it. We do not want to be part of it."

Workers speak out on students before putting them on the cart return.

Then there are the students who come in and hope nobody will notice their actions. A tall girl walked into the DUC with a suspicious look on her face. After grabbing several steinils, she made her way over to the desert section. When she thought no one was looking, she proceeded to take several bites from the variety of cakes laid out. If this wasn't bad enough, she then released the cake-covered fork so it discreetly found a place on the counter. She left without buying a single item.

According to Shana Smith, who works at the Manchu Wok, the biggest problem she has ever seen is the impudence of students when what they want is not immediately available to them. "They don't understand that it takes time to make the food they want taste right. I could give it to them when they want it, but it's not taste any good," she said.

In addition, the students are often not responsive to the smiles of the food service staff, said Smith. "If I'm speaking to you with a smile on my face, you should speak to me with a smile on your face, too. That would be the nice thing to do," she said.

"I can't stand when the students leave their trash and trays on the tables. It's like they think they have some maid working here," said Teri Ogden, a cashier. "That is an unusual comment from Ogden, who can always be seen with a smile on her face. But I like working here. I can get to know a lot of the students." Ogden is well known among the student