

The center of U.S. Civil Rights Movements in 1950s started with a use of nonviolent way of protest by Martin Luther King, Jr. Since then, racial problems in the country seems to have diminished and recovered its racial equality, but, in fact, they are still in the process, which lead to the creation of "Black Lives Matter" movement that campaigns against violence and systemic racism toward black people. Police brutality and implicated racial segregation is surely a nationwide problem, but also a way to counteract to this social issue is also significant. Nonviolent direct-action protest has been tainted with many violent protest actions as we can see in the protests in Charlotte, North Carolina. Though police officers are expected to protect all people equally, it is not so same in many black communities. This social unfairness is the reason that taints the thinking of protesters and makes them rise against the society violently.
